JAMES BUCHANAN.

WASHINGTON, 17 December, 1858.

To the Senate of the United States :

The Senate will learn from the thirty-five naval nominations herewith submitted the result of my investigations under the resolutions of Congress of March 10th and May 11th, 1858. In compliance with these resolutions I have carefully examined the records of the courts of inquiry in fifty-eight cases, and have arrived at the conclusion that twenty-three of the officers ought to remain in the positions where they have been fixed by the courts of inquiry.

The records are very voluminous, and the labor of examination, in which I have been materially assisted by the Secretary of the Navy, the Attorney-General, and the Commissioner of Patents, has consumed much time.

Under the act of January 17th, 1857, the courts of inquiry were directed to investigate "the physical, mental, professional, and moral fitness" of each officer who applied to them for relief. These investigations it was my duty to review. They have been very extensive and searching, as the Senate will perceive from an examination of the records, embracing in many instances almost the entire professional life of the individual from his first entrance into the service.

In the performance of my duty I found the greatest difficulty in deciding what should be considered as "moral fitness" for the Navy. Physical, mental, and professional fitness may be decided with a considerable degree of accuracy by a naval court of inquiry, but the question of moral fitness is of a very different character. There has been but one perfect standard of morality on earth, and how far a departure from His precepts and example must proceed in order to disqualify an officer for the naval service is a question on which a great difference of honest opinion must always exist. On this question I have differed in several instances from the courts of inquiry.

There is one nomination which I regret that I have not the power to present to the Senate, and this is in the case of Commodore Stewart. His name stood on the Register at the head of the list of captains in the Navy until it was removed from this well-earned position by the retiring board and placed on the list of retired officers. The deeply wounded feelings of this veteran officer, who had contributed so much to the efficiency and glory of the Navy from its infancy, prevented him from applying for restoration to his rank and submitting to a court of inquiry, composed of his junior officers, the question of his "physical, mental, professional, and moral fitness" for the naval service. I would ere this have recommended to Congress the passage of a joint resolution to restore him to his former rank had I not believed this would more appropriately emanate from the legislative branch of Government.

I transmit herewith to the Senate the original records in the fifty-eight cases to which I have referred. After they shall have been examined by the Senate, I would respectfully request that they might be returned to the Navy Department.

JAMES BUCHANAN.

WASHINGTON, December 20, 1858

To the Senate of the United States:

By the authority conferred upon me by the joint resolution of March 10th and May 11th, 1858, in case where the records of the courts of inquiry, appointed under the act of January 16th, 1857, may render it advisable, in the opinion of the President of the United States, to nominate before the 1st of January, 1859, to the active or reserved list of the Navy, or to transfer from furlough to leave of absence on the latter list any officer who may have been dropped or retired by the operation of the act of February 28th, 1855, I nominate the following officers who were dropped or retired by the operation of the above act, as follows:

Philip F. Voorhees, a captain on the reserved list on furlough pay, to leave pay.

Thomas Paine, a captain on the reserved list on furlough pay, to the active list, to take rank next after Captain Thomas Crabbe.

William Ramsay, a captain, dropped to the active list, to take rank next after Captain French Forrest.

William Inman, a captain on the reserved list on leave pay, to the active list, to take rank next after Captain Josiah Tattnall.

Samuel W. Lecompte, a commander on the reserved list on furlough pay, to leave pay.

William M. Armstrong, a commander on the reserved list on leave pay, to be a captain on the active list, to take rank next after Captain Joseph R. Jarvis.

Andrew K. Long, a commander on the reserved list on furlough pay, to be a captain on the active list, to take rank next after Captain Henry Eagle.

Zachariah F. Johnston, a commander, dropped, to take rank next after Captain George S. Blake.

T. Darrah Shaw, a commander on the reserved list on leave pay, to be a commander on the active list, to take rank next after Commander Wm. C. Whittle.

William D. Porter, a lieutenant on the reserved list on furlough pay, to be a commander on the active list, to take rank next after Commander Henry K. Thatcher.

Mr. Davis, from the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia, to whom was referred, December 13th, the nomination of James Simons, reported.

Mr. Davis, from the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia, submitted the following report:

The Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia, to whom was referred the nomination of Dr. James Simons, to be surgeon, vice Harney, deceased, and to take rank next after Surgeon De Leon, having had the same under consideration, report:

The act of March 3, 1851, chapter 33, provides "that all promotions in the staff department or corps shall be made as in the other corps of the Army." Thus the rule of promotion in the medical staff was made thereafter to conform to the existing general rule of promotion in the Army, to wit, by seniority. The committee therefore hold that the law requires the vacancy created in the grade of surgeon by the death of Surgeon Harney to be filled by the promotion of the senior assistant surgeon. It only remained, therefore, for the committee to determine whether the nominee (Dr. Simons) is the senior assistant surgeon; and, after a careful examination, they have reached the conclusion that this question must be answered in the negative.

It appears that Dr. Simons was arraigned before a general court-martial, which convened at Fort Riley on the 25th September, 1855, in pursuance of special orders from the War Department, and, in conformity with the rules and articles of war, he was tried and sentenced to be dismissed the service of the United States. The President approved the sentence. It was executed on the 16th January, 1856, and from that date, therefore, Assistant Surgeon James Simons ceased to be an officer of the Army. Being out of the service, he applied for permission to appear before a medical board, as provided by the act of June 30, 1834; and, having been examined and approved as a candidate for admission into the medical staff of the Army, he was, upon the happening of a vacancy during the recess of the Senate, viz, on the 3d October, 1857, appointed by the President an assistant surgeon, to take rank from that date, and was so nominated to the Senate at its next session. This nomination the Senate confirmed, but with a recommendation to the President to give him rank according to a commission he formerly held as assistant surgeon, of date the 11th July, 1839, and a commission bearing that date, not the date for which he had been nominated and confirmed, was issued to him. But it was not legally competent to the President to issue a commission conferring this rank without first, according to the course prescribed by the Constitution, making the proper nomination to the Senate and having their consent and advice to the appointment subsequent and not precedent to such nomination.

This is the doctrine of the Constitution, as asserted by three Attorneys-General, to wit, Butler, Nelson, and Clifford, and as heretofore accepted by the Executive. Attorney-General Butler (Opinion, March 29, 1837) says, "the case involves constitutional questions of much practical importance." "The Senate has no power to originate an appointment; its constitutional action is confined to a simple affirmation or rejection of the President's nomination. Whenever the Senate disagrees to such nomination it fails; and no appointment can be made except upon a new nomination to be made by the President. Suggestions as to the views of the Senate, in cases where that body disagrees to the President's nomination, may, no doubt, be informally communicated to him; but should he think proper to conform to these views, I know of no way in which it can be done consistently with the provisions of the Constitution, except by the making a new nomination in accordance therewith." Mr. Butler proceeds to suggest that perhaps, "as a superior rank may be said to include the inferior, the President may accept the confirmation to a rank inferior to that specified in the nomination, and issue a commission thereon," but otherwise when the Senate proposes a prior date to the commission. These views of the constitutional question Mr. Butler urges as involving "the harmony of the two co-ordinate branches, the independence of the President, the just weight of the Senate, the useful operation of the appointing power."

The same case being subsequently before Attorney-General Nelson, he affirmed the same doctrine (Opinion, August 9, 1843). "The opinion of Mr. Butler" he says, "was recognized as the law of the case by the then President." It was so recognized by President Tyler himself (in submitting a new nomination). "To disturb these reiterated decisions now would, I think, tend to the subversion of principles upon the consistent maintainance of which the most important interests of the Government are dependent." And Mr. Attorney-General Clifford (Opinion, July 14, 1847) to the same point: "In consequence of the variation of the approval from the nomination, no commission could issue." It follows, then, that the commission dated July 11, 1859, issued by President Buchanan to Dr. Simons, is not valid, and cannot place him, where it was designed to place him, at the head of the assistant surgeons, entitled by the law, in regard to promotion, to fill the first vacancy among the surgeons, but that his date and rank in the Medical Corps of the Army is of October 3, 1856, according to the nomination of President Pierce, and the confirmation of the Senate.

This appointment, however, is claimed for Dr. Simons on another ground; that it is a restoration to his former rank. Now, a restoration certainly can be nothing, in fact or in law, but a new appointment, except in the case of an illegal and invalid removal from office, which is no removal at all in law, and may be so treated in fact. But if the removal was valid in law it cannot be annulled in fact. This principle is as well settled by authority as it is clear in reason. Mr. Legaré, Attorney-General (in Dubarry's case, November 29, 1842), said (to cite in this place only so much of that opinion as applies to this point): "He was clearly out of service by a lawful and valid, however harsh, and it may even be unfair, exercise of the Executive power. The act dismissing him cannot be avoided. It is beyond the power of the Executive. All that the President can do in such cases is to repair the wrong done by a new appointment." And Mr. Attorney-General Nelson (January 23, 1844): "I know of no power by which an officer once out of service can be brought back to it, other than by that of appointment."

Mr. Nelson lays down (November 6, 1843), the same doctrine in Whitney's case, and declares any other doctrine or practice to be "in direct repugnance to the Constitution and laws." Dr. Simons was out of the service by a valid and irreversible act. He was adjudged to be dismissed from the service by the sentence of a court martial, which sentence was duly confirmed and executed by the President, and it is not contended that these proceedings were illegal, that either the court or the President exceeded their jurisdiction or authority, but it is urged that the verdict and sentence were harsh, and it is erroneously stated they were reported by the Committee on Military Affairs to be unjust. This objection furnishes no ground now to set them aside.

Mr. Attorney-General Cushing lays down in Howe's case (Opinion, June 5, 1854), that if there be no "cause in law or fact to declare the sentence of the court-martial void ab initio, there is no rightful cause or authority to review or reverse it for alleged error." And Mr. Attorney-General Nelson, in Moorhead's case (Opinion, November 6, 1843): "The facts disclosed by the record show it to be one in which the sentence pronounced and executed was peculiarly harsh and severe. The proceedings of the court were exceedingly irregular; testimony manifestly illegal was admitted, whilst that which was legal was ruled inadmissible. But still I do not perceive that these irregularities can be regarded as annulling the judgment pronounced. They might be appealed to as reasons why the revisory power, when called to act upon the proceedings, should not have approved the finding and sentence of the court, but that approval having been signified, they cannot avail wholly to avoid everything that has been done. The judgment of the tribunal created by the law has been pronounced and carried into effect, and the officer upon whom it operated was thenceforth unquestionably out of service. The judgment I now hold to be irreversible," and Mr. Nelson then repeats the doctrine as heretofore reported, "if Mr. Moorhead is restored to the service it must be through the power of appointment."

Having thus shown that the dismissal of Dr. Simons cannot be annulled, and that his restoration can only be by a new appointment, it remains to consider, first, whether such appointment can be made, and, second, whether it ought to be made.

1. He cannot be appointed to this vacancy, nor to the head of the list of assistant surgeons, nor to rank by date of commission any assistant surgeon who was already in commission on the 3d October, 1856, when he was reappointed, if the laws regulating appointments and promotions in the Army by seniority be valid and binding. That they are cannot be questioned, unless they are overridden by the constitutional prerogatives of the appointing power.

If this be, indeed, the doctrine of the Constitution, if this formidable prerogative, uncontrollable by law, is lodged in the appointing power, it is now, as the committee believe, asserted for the first time. They find many such laws prescribing conditions and qualifications for office, and imposing restrictions upon the appointing power. They conceive, to use the language of Mr. Attorney-General Legaré, in regard to the Senate, that all laws do, to say the least, "challenge the respect of that august body," and they are not aware that the validity of these laws has ever been questioned by the Executive.

In regard to this office of surgeon the law has imposed various restraints on the appointment. It requires that the appointee shall be first examined and found competent by a medical board; also, that he shall have served five years as an assistant surgeon. (See act of June 30, 1834, chap. 133.)

Are these laws invalid, as well as the law in favor of seniority? Are the various laws requiring appointments in the staff to be made from the line invalid? Is the law which has so long existed regulating promotions in the regiments by seniority invalid? If it could be necessary to point to a special grant in the Constitution to the law-making power in this regard, the committee would refer to the authority to make rules for the government and regulation of the land and naval forces. Surely, a rule of promotion is among the most obvious of these.

The committee cannot doubt that the laws of promotion in the Army are constitutional and binding laws, and that they forbid the appointment now proposed to the Senate. It is true that Attorneys-General Legaré and Clifford, in Dubarry's case, and Nelson in Whitney's and Moorhead's, recognize the legality of such appointments. These cases, however, were in the Navy, where no law regulating appointments and promotions exists to forbid them.

Mr. Nelson, in his opinion, January 23, 1844, admits that in regard to the Navy the appointing power was controlled while the temporary law of August 4, 1842, was in force. Mr. Legaré, in the leading case of Dubarry, which the other cases follow, has certainly no intention to assert any authority in the appointing power, independent of, or superior to law; on the contrary, he says expressly: "Appointments have reference to the laws which they are made to fulfill, and seem to be not valid, except so far as they conform to these laws." The antedating of commissions, he suggests, must be for a good legal reason; for instance, he says, "an officer under arrest on groundless charges is not promoted, because promotion were a pardon; but he is acquitted, and is nominated by relation back."

Everybody sees that this is no arbitrary advancement through partiality, but sheer justice, and a faithful execution of the law. So, if any law entitle an officer to promotion at the end of ten years, and the Executive having neglected to give him his due for some time, afterwards confer it, relation back seems called for by the law itself. "This," he says, "is Vinton's case." (2 Sum., 299.) This was an Army case, where the commission by brevet was antedated in strict compliance with the law. And Mr. Legaré, in regard to the restoration of an officer to his former rank, says, unless "prohibited by some special law." In the present case it is submitted whether the antedates given to the commission of assistant surgeon, and again in the nomination to be surgeon, are not prohibited by the special laws governing promotion in the medical staff and fixing the number of surgeons and assistant surgeons of the Army. The legal right of promotion is lost by every officer whose position is affected by the antedate; and an appointment which takes effect before the vacancy occurred necessarily increases the grade beyond the number fixed by law.

On the second point, whether this nomination ought to be confirmed, if the law permitted it, the committee desire to say but little, and that in reference rather to the very important principle involved than to the merits of this case.

It is a case in which one Executive reviews the act and rejudges the judgment of his predecessor. Formerly this was considered inadmissible. "Each administration," says Mr. Attorney-General Wirt, October 1, 1825, "ought to consider the acts of its predecessors conclusive; otherwise no question could be settled, but the executive business would be always in confusion." "If," he says, "a decision of Mr. Monroe may be reviewed by Mr. Adams, he does not see how he could refuse to review and reverse the decision of Mr. Washington, upon the application of any aggrieved party." And Mr. Attorney-General Toucey, September 8, 1848, said: "It might well be asked which of the two high functionaries exercising the same authority would, in contemplation of law, be deemed to be in the right—the one who, at a proper time, and on a proper occasion, exercised his legitimate authority according to his best judgment, or the one who undertook to go back into a past stage of administration and revise the acts of his predecessor, whose power was equal to or identical with his own."

It does not appear that the Executive has attempted to review or reverse the decision in this case, but that he merely acted "in respectful compliance with the recommendation and request of the Senate."

But can the Senate set as a tribunal of appeal to review, upon the evidence, the verdict of courts? If such appeal could be allowed in this case it must be allowed in all; it cannot, in honor and justice, be denied in any; and the whole time of the Senate may henceforth be employed in assuming the legal jurisdiction of courts-martial. A crowd of cases may await their review upon the principles of this case.

For all which reasons, as aforesaid, to wit, that the proceedings dismissing Dr. Simons cannot be avoided, and that he cannot lawfully be restored to his former rank by a new appointment, and that the law requires the appointment now of the senior assistant surgeon, the committee recommend that this nomination be not confirmed.

On motion by Mr. Davis,

Ordered, That the said report be printed in confidence for the use of the Senate.
